PART II

COURSE DESCRIPTION AND AIMS

The mere idea of genocide was revolutionary and controversial, both in the legal realm and in the historical field. There is no doubt that, to this day, it constitutes one of the most contentious concepts in the area of international law. The main objective of this course is to unravel its inherent complexities. The 20th century is rich in contradictions: while the peoples of the world have usually been sensitive to genocides, irrespective of when and where they took place, decision-makers have generally been systematic deniers. Even though the term evokes the darkest pages of (in)humanity, it has always been used as a political tool. In this sense, historical facts and legal notions have been distorted either to fabricate a genocide or to contest it, no matter how untrue these narratives might have been.

The course will focus on genocide as a global phenomenon, trying to eradicate the pervasive assumption that it might only happen in certain latitudes and the preconception that certain societies might never fall into such moral decay. In this respect, a wide array of cases will be discussed, applying historical and legal perspectives to enable the students to better understand this scourge, both in abstract terms and specific situations.

The course will use audiovisual sources, including documentary and feature films, accounts, news, interviews, autobiographical excerpts, treaties, judgments, and reports, among other legal instruments, all of which will allow the students to grasp various perspectives on genocide. Raising awareness of such a complex phenomenon only constitutes the first step; the main aim is to provide the students with the necessary tools to analyze it in depth, individually elucidating how different accounts have tried to manipulate history and the law.

The period in focus is the twentieth century, although historical literature on genocides in previous centuries might be referred to, most notably in settler colonial contexts. Overall, the course goes beyond understanding genocides as events; and will hopefully demonstrate how they form long-term human experiences.

The main idea of the course is to be an interactive setting in which students shape their opinions and understandings on the matter. In this sense, depending on the number of students enrolled, there might be individual or group presentations throughout the semester in which the course materials will be discussed collectively.

TEACHING METHODOLOGY (SOCRATIC METHOD)

The main goal of the course is to discuss genocide events as multifaceted social experiences whose complexity allows for the broadest analyses. When dealing with such shocking phenomena, the aim is to understand the deep-rooted social causes of the same and their long-term consequences, including their legal treatment in different contexts.

Lectures ought to be heavily imbued by discussion, which should not be dialectic but constructive, always academic, and, beyond anything else, respectful of different standpoints. Although many materials cover historical aspects of the events that will be inquired into, the focus should not be the discussion of facts but narratives, perspectives, and rationales.

The Socratic method of teaching will be followed. The professor will act as mere moderator in a non-hierarchical setting. In this regard, students must read the materials before each class and lead the discussion. Class participation will be appraised as a continuous assessment, comprising a significant aspect of the final grade (see “Grading of student achievement”).

INTENDED LEARNING OUTCOMES

From the beginning, students must understand that there is no attempt to establish a single truth but to foster, through a wide array of sources, an encompassing understanding of genocides. In addition, it is paramount to be aware that no material is objective and unbiased; therefore, each authority (including the legal ones) dealt with needs to be critically analyzed.

One of the course aims is to make students deal with various sources, which many times might even be contradictory, and allow them to choose whichever they find the most adequate to build their argument on controversial matters.

By the end of the semester, students should be able to:

- Understand that genocide events are never abrupt and isolated.
- Compare examples from different latitudes and times.
- Form an opinion on how the international community has reacted to different genocides.
- Critically analyze the applicable legal framework and evaluate whether it helps prevent, deal with, and punish such atrocities.
- Comprehend that Law is a social creation that can never be isolated from its historical context.
- Consider the role played by certain actors whose contribution was particularly significant to bring about the current legal structure regarding the crime of genocide.

- Recognize the difference between genocide as an unlawful act of a State, giving rise to State responsibility, and genocide as a crime, triggering individual accountability.
